It all started with a tweet.

The account of Marvin Austin sparked a scandal, full of twists and turns, as broad as the University it continues to threaten.

As UNC waits on its latest probe, The Daily Tar Heel reviews...

Fall 2010: The University revealed that a former tutor, later identified as Wiley, gave impermissible academic assistance to some football players. Meanwhile, initial reports focused on players who received gifts in violation of NCAA rules. The NCAA ruled Little, Quinn and McAdoo permanently ineligible, while Austin was dismissed from the team. Blake resigned Sept. 5.

July 2011: A term paper by McAdoo was discovered to have been plagiarized, an offense that went undetected by the honor system and the course's professor, Nyang'oro. This marked the beginning of the investigation into the University's academics.

A cross-departmental investigation into a culture of academic misconduct doesn't come cheap.

The University has paid a $15,000 retainer to Baker Tilly Virchow Krause LLC, a consulting firm based in Washington, D.C. that was hired to assist former Gov. Jim Martin in the review.

According to the firm's contract, the entire review will cost between $70,000 and $90,000 — plus travel expenses from the firm's headquarters. The contract states this sum reflects a 20 percent discount from the firm's normal fee.

Chancellor Holden Thorp called on Martin in August to conduct an independent review of the University's Department of African and Afro-American Studies. Martin will attempt to have a report ready for the Board of Governors panel on Oct. 11.

In the past two weeks, Martin and the firm's team have conducted 16 interviews—each lasting about an hour, Martin said.

An internal report released in the spring detailed improper teaching practices occurring primarily in African and Afro-American Studies' summer courses between 2007 and 2009, and placed responsibility on thendepartment chairman Julius Nyang'oro and administrator Deborah Crowder.

So far, Martin said he and the consultants at Baker Tilly are on track to meet their deadline. But measuring when he will be done is not a cut-and-dry procedure.

"You don't know until you finish," Martin said. "You keep finding things that string out that could take longer, but we think we're on target."
